"As chie is Wrote."

A gentleman of this city, thinking that the Isystenosus might become one of a syndicate to open business relations with a house in Bordeaux, sends to this office a proposal which he has received. The communication is in print, which is very fortunate, seeing that our foreign friends do not always write so as to be readily followed by those unfamiliar with their peculiar chirography.

The communication is addressed to "Gentleman," to whom the foreign correspondents thus frankly introduce themselves: "One of us being an ex-deputy, magistrate, municipal-officer, counsellor and public fonctionary, we beg, under those diverse qualifies, to ask you whether you would recommend to us, amongst your protegees, a respectable person to act avoursgent." Dealing in Bordeaux wines and brandless "year as the leavest Toothed Sultan.

Dealing in Bordeaux wines their origin," which is no small undertaking in these days when articles of this character are perversely determined to obscure their origin with leg wood and other descrifted things.

In this world good things are worth a good price, and the Wheeling connoisseur is notified with all the caudor of the French character that "it is necessary you will accept our prices, the want of stock, At last the opportunity came, and as the and brandles "we are able to warrant you

At last the opportunity came, and as the Sultan was driven - past his German adwill accept our prices, the want of stock, will accept our prices, the want of social bad harvests aud too many illnesses ravaging our vineyards, since ten years, being a Continual Cause of incresse." The American correspondent can have no further question of the absolute honesty of these wine sollers of Bordeaux when they throw themselves; on, him in this fashion. "We would never be so fool as to tell you that we can secure you with good wines at a low price, good produces always being expensive;" at the same time they do not fear the quality of their goods, as they never sell as claret that which has in it nothing of the price of the grape. If this statement be true, it warrants all assurances of honesty which these French gentlemen make for themselves.

They desire to know whether the wine to be ordered is to be used at once or "kept to leave it grow older, and whether it is destined to a young or old weak person." If the quantity which they propose bad harvests and too many lines ravag- mirer vigorously saluted him.

It is only when we see our stubborn langerage floored by a foreigner that we are able to appreciate how very easily it is overcome by strategy and a buildog determination.
